William A. Brady, who is energetic even at the end of a long and not especially encouraging dramatic season, presented last night at the Maxine Elliott Theatre "The Charm of Isabel," described as a comedy by Sidney Rosenfeld. It is explained that the charm of this heroine lay in her inability to say "no." The three acts showed vivaciously the consequences of this weakness. One passed in Paris and the two others in a country town. All three were dominated by the character of leabel. From its importance in the play as well as from its nature, one is led to suspect that the comedy may have been written with the delightful talents of Grace George in view. The leading role was very well played last night by Marie Nordstrom.

The programme erred in limiting the charms of this heroine to a merely negative trait. She was positively fascinating. She managed to start a French admirer travelling over the world after her and then she found a Yankee invalid, coddled and nursed by a domineering aunt until he felt it was impossible for him to rise from the invalid chair in which his time from the invalid chair in which his time was passed, until the ministrations of feabel supplemented those of his feminine relative. It is true that a bottle of champagne was included in her prescriptions, but the result was favorable and the invalid never returned to his chair.

Then the irresistible Isabel so charmed the young son of the family just home from his preparation to enter orders that she syncopated a hymn tune for him and he liked it. He liked her much more afterward and when the French suitor who had started from Paris in the first act reached this country in the last he found the object of his affections already interested in another. But Isabel looked out for his happiness. She could not marry him but she arranged for him to marry her friend and that had all been settled when he came back from fighting a duel on her account.

a duel on her account.

If there ever was a dea ex machina who understood how to make herself indispensable it was this same Isabel, who was fascinating on two continents. It was a sad feature of her irresistible influence that at the and of the host her her treated. showed not the least inclination to return to the study of the calling to which he had previously devoted himself. He was also by way of departing for Paris to anto the forthermine. also by way of departing for Paris to enjoy the forthcoming honeymoon there.

So was the invalid, restored to health by Isabel and her champagne, in spite of the protests of his devoted aunt.

"The Charm of Isabel" is altogether harmless and much of its action is sprightly. There is some wit in the protection and the same and the audience less right same. speeches and the audience last night gave few evidences of ennul. The manner of was the customary 90 horse-power way of acting comic dramas which Mr. Brady impresses on his companies. Miss Nordstrom's playing of the heroine was highly intelligent and there were few values in her role that she did not realize. Florence Garsile and N. A. The Webb brothers, who have been producing a light opera of their own making each season and devoting the profits to charity, pleased a large audience at Wallack's Theatre last night with their latest offering. They called it "Leap Year Land." Roy Webb wrote the "Leap Year Land." Roy Webb wrote the distribution of the control of music and conducted the orchestra at last night's performance, and Kenneth S.
